Topic of the week

ASIC has taken their first greenwashing case to court, following through with the pledge to crackdown on various super funds and companies. As defined by ASIC, greenwashing is "the practice of misrepresenting the extent to which a financial product or investment strategy is environmentally friendly, sustainable or ethical." Research by the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission (ACCC) in October last year used internet sweeps to search for super funds and companies making false environmental and sustainability claims. It was estimated that around 40% of the investigated global companies were making fraudulent claims. These misleading claims varied from inaccurate screening processes and investment exclusions to statements about reducing emissions or carbon neutrality.

The first greenwashing case that ASIC will take to court is against Mercer Superannuation over their Sustainable Plus investment option. Mercer marketed the investment option as sustainable with exclusions on investments involved in fossil fuels, alcohol and gambling. However, ASIC found that the investment option still invested in 15 companies involved with production or sale of carbon intensive fossil fuels including AGL, BHP Group and Whitehaven Coal, 15 companies involved with alcohol including Budweiser, Heineken, and Treasury Wine Estates and a further 19 companies involved in gambling including Crown Resorts and Tabcorp. ASIC is seeking declarations and fines from the Court in addition to injunctions for Mercer to remove all misleading statements and publicise its wrongdoings.

For an increasing number of investors, environmental and sustainability concerns are major considerations as the world tackles climate change and the shift to renewable energy. ASIC will continue its crackdown on companies, to ensure consumers are protected from greenwashing.
