Topic of the week

The COVIDSafe app has been decommissioned this week with Health Minister Mark Butler describing the app as “failed” and a “colossal waste of taxpayers’ money.” Originally launched in April 2020 during the first wave of the pandemic, the app was designed to help contact tracers locate close contacts. Now, a new update has been released on the App store, announcing the decommissioning of the app and when downloaded, “removes functionality” and stored information.

The COVIDSafe app used Bluetooth to detect other devices that had been within 1.5 metres for more than 15 minutes. If an app user contracted COVID-19, they would be requested to upload their data. Contact tracers could then use the data to contact owners of all detected devices. With privacy and security concerns over the app’s tracking data, COVIDSafe only received 7.9 million downloads with less than 800 data uploads. After over two years of the app in operation, only seventeen close contacts were discovered that manual contact tracing had not. Out of those seventeen close contacts, only two positive cases of COVID-19 were identified.

The app has cost more than $21 million to build and run with $10 million attributed to development, $7 million to advertising, and more than $2 million each to staff and app upkeep. With COVID-19 policies having changed and running costs of $75,000 per month, the decision was made by the Albanese Government to cease the app.
